He thought that the House would stultify itself if it should turn round and say, 'We are not a House and will not receive it.' He was of the opinion that they should receive it, and let it lie uron the table until, having effected an organization, they should be ready to hear it read and to act upon it.

"Mr. Carlile of Virginia, concurred with his colleague (Mr. Millson) that they were a House in their present condition. He thought that it was fair to presume that the President would not have sent in his communication this morning unless it treated of matters of which the country and the House should be no further time would be consumed in discussion, but the same carriage." that the message would be at once read."

The President takes strong grounds for the South, and this portion of the Message will receive the hearty approval of every true patriot in the landit matters not that he reside north or south of Mason and Dixon's line. We earnestly commend this portion to our readers, and hope none will fail to give it a careful perusal. The Petersburg Intelligencer (Whig-Know-Noth-

He (the President) winds up with a notice at considerable length of the "Con-titutional Relations of Slavery," which he discusses with a force and fair ness that will be universally admitted outside of the pale of fanaticism. We have not had time to read what he says under this head with the attention that it deserves, but, from our hasty overlooking of it, it strikes us that the views and opinions which he expresses are perfectly sound.

The Baltimore Patriot (Whig-Know-Nothing) pays the following high tribute :

The remainder of the Message consists of an elaborate review of the slavery question. It is a hold and fearless argument, taking high Southern ground in favor of State rights, and denouncing, with unsparing severity, the efforts made by the free-soil party to legislate upon a subject over which, the Message contends, they have no constitutional authority whatever. This portion of the Message is marked by a vigor of tone, and a force of expression, which occasionally breaks out into invective. President Pierce does not leave his position on this great and at present absorbing question in doubt for a single moment. He has taken his stand fearlessly, and whatever may be thought of the wisdom of his course, we cannot but honor him for his manliness with which he has thus publicly avowed his sentiments, while we feel satisfied with their utterance, in words so distinct and unequivical, will rouse a storm of indignation in some sections of the country, which for fierceness and vindictive vituperation, will find no parallel in the political history of the Republic.

The Patriot is right We already hear the muttering of the free-soil "storm," but its fiercest blasts will only rally the patriots of the land around the hold and elevated constitutional ground the President has taken. As an indication of the abuse that will be showered upon his head by the free-soil papers, we extract the following from the Philadelphia North

"The abjectness of his submission almost surpasses belief, and, if we mistake not, will disgust even those whom it was intended to flatter. Among the many objectionable pronunciamentos against the North, which have, from time to time, been issued by the Governors of Southern States, we do not remember any one in which the assumptions of wrong doing on the part of the free Commonwealths of this by itself. Union have been more unblushingly asserted, or the gentle, patient, forbearing spirit of our slaveholding kinsfolk more pathetically set forth than in the manifesto signed by the gentleman from New Hampshire, who at present occupies the Presidential chair. It will trouble his Excellency, Gov. Wise of Virginia, to match it. Of course Mr. Pierce knew that such declarations as he has here solemnly put on record, of indignation throughout the Northern States, and the 22d inst. renew and increase that agitation which all true patriots desire to see forever quieted. And with such consequences of his act."

The Next President.

The following timely suggestions from the Richmond Enquirer, cannot be too extensively copied: "The Democracy is now one determined, compact, and national party. Sectional feuds and sectional feelings are obliterated and forgotten. It is the party of the Constitution and the country-the only integrity, not divide it by discussions as to the superior claims of the North and South to the next killed Presidency. The Democratic party knows no North. no South. It recognises no sectional, no personal, claim to the Presidency.
